I'll be back... Supreme Court justices hear arguments in new citizenship case The Supreme Court heard arguments Tuesday in a challenge to the Obama administration's plan to expand immigration enforcement, touching on the separation of powers, due process and a landmark Supreme Court case from nearly a century ago. Following President Barack Obama's executive order in 2014, the government issued letters to about 500,000 immigrants in the United States and ordered them to return to their home countries or face deportation, according to The New York Times. Among those potentially affected was a now-20-year-old woman, Pablo Nunez Mendez, who was brought to the U.S. at the age of eight. In court papers, she argues that she became a U.S. citizen at age 15 after moving to the country with her parents and applying for citizenship while she was a minor. Because she became a citizen, she says, the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 bars her from having her citizenship revoked as a result of her parents' unauthorized presence. The administration, however, is using a 1952 Immigration and Nationality Act which made it a crime for someone to remain in the country after being ordered removed. Violators could be imprisoned for up to two years. "If you come here as a child and within the next two years you decide that this is where you want to live, it has to be reasonably clear that it's what you want," said Solicitor General Donald Verrilli, whose argument is backed by conservative groups opposed to the executive order. "They don't get to essentially decide when they want to be an American citizen." "In the past, immigration law has said that noncitizens could remain in this country but only after a prolonged period of absence," said Elena Kagan, the court's fourth justice. "Today, the statute says they can remain in this country but only when an agency tells them to." As a district court judge, Obama's executive order was struck down by a separate 3-2 vote of the court. The ruling prompted the government to appeal and the court to hold arguments in the case of Obama v. Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals at 10:00 a.m. on Tuesday. The argument comes just four months before Obama's term in office ends, and the White House has made the ability to access a federal court and due process an issue in the mid-term elections. But Mendez's attorney,
